public affairs, he would stand much better. You have educated us to expect the president to talk, and he who falls short of your measure, will be a public disappointment.

Then the president ought to say a wise word to allay the Protestant ill-feeling and at the same time let Rome know her place in such a way as would prevent exception being taken, ^{and} he would immensely please again. He is a Protestant, and can not be expected to attend Catholic ceremonies and lend himself to even the appearance of intrigue.

All together the public wants you, and is looking to you to say something to check the orgy of "peace" going on in Washington. Think of $25,000,000
